Publication: Business Report (Mercury)

Date: 31 Jan 2017 Page: 13

No SABS, claims the coatings industry Roy Cakayne dustry claims the paint testing laboratories at the SA Bureau to be non operational, which was damaging the industry. Deryck Spence, the executive director of the SA Paint Manufacturing Association (Sapma), said yesterday that the SABS paint section is believed to be operating through a single employee – a far cry

SOUTH Africa's coatings in-

of Standards (SABS) appeared

"I know for a fact the SABS is not testing paint anymore. About 20 Sapma members submitted products to the SABS for testing and indicated the SABS had done nothing,"

"We have a major problem

He added that an SABS with them (SABS). I'm not for from about 13 employees it used nearly two years ago.

one minute saying the SABS is collapsing, but the paint section is."

Spence said.

approval.

quality approval mark was essential for any government contract. "The Department of Public Works simply will not award tenders for products that do not carry the SABS marks of "This precludes many of our members from bidding for lucrative government projects. Yet all Sapma approaches and appeals to the SABS have no response and the drawn SABS testing laboratories

Spence said the SABS was charging R100 000 for a company to get a quality mark for a single paint product, but coatings companies could not

He said the SABS standards would appear to be non operational," he said.

get the testing done.

only recognised national institution for the development, maintenance and promotion of South African National Standards (SANS), which formed the basis for all the other services offered by the SABS, such division described itself as the as testing and certification. But Spence said Sapma was hugely concerned about the lack of co-operation it was receiving from the SABS. "In fact, the coatings industry is beginning to question if the SABS is still an active guardian and promoter of quality standards in this country, or even operating at all in ing signs of total apathy and alarming disinterest in the past year, based on our dealings, or attempted dealing, with the bureau," he said.

"There have been increas-key areas.

Spence said the SABS was also the only government body that could provide the specifications for quality management systems and test methods for the coatings industry. Ian Plaatjes, the SABS corporate services executive, said some of Sapma's allegations were unfounded but the SABS was still open to having a discussion with the association with a view to resolving issues.

Plaatjes said the SABS was committed to protecting and promoting the South African economy by ensuring that products and services were of a high quality and met established standards. He said the paint industry was an important part of the economy and the SABS worked

"It is unfortunate that the closely with the industry.

comments made by Sapma do not refer to any specific complaints, especially as Sapma has been part of our technical committees for more than 20 years and is still an active member," he said. Plaajes did not respond to specific questions posed by Business Report.