R93m splurged on luxuries for ministers

An executive at a top kitchen design outlet said it was “normal” for modern kitchen upgrades to cost as much as R1m, depending on the type of finishes chosen.

“I did a deal the other day for a million. It’s not the size, it’s the finishes,” she said, preferring to remain anonymous.

But the spending has been slammed as “in very poor taste” given the country’s dire economy and attempts to curtail pay increases for civil servants.

“Our country simply cannot afford to keep paying for lifestyles of ministers who live like rock stars while load-shedding, unemployment and poverty are at crisis levels,” said Schreiber.

A construction service provider who asked to remain anonymous said the expenditure on waterproofing appeared to be inflated. “We see this every day. I don’t think the pricing is by service providers but by corrupt officials who insist on price inflation so that they can get kickbacks,” he said.

Zikalala said the “costs of some of these items are not justifiable and smack of mischief by service providers who seem to have identified the department of public works as a milk cow”.

“This puts a stain on public representatives and portrays them as if they have sanctioned such procurement. We have a duty to lead by example and set the right tone in spending public monies.

“We are alive to the reality that everyone is facing a financial squeeze because of the rise of the cost of living. We therefore need to ensure that we take good care of public money.”

Zikalala, a former premier of KwaZulu-Natal, said no minister had a say in the multi-million-rand public works spree.

“We wish to assure the public that there is no political principal who is involved with the excessive finishes and all of us as government abhor any excessive conduct with taxpayers’ money, especially at this time when we are deploying resources to core services.”

The supply of free electricity, water and other municipal services to ministerial homes in Cape Town and Pretoria cost taxpayers R43m between 2020 and 2022.

“This means that the government spent an average of nearly R1m on each mansion in just two years. The expenses incurred were for renovations, repairs, municipal rates and services including free water and electricity,” said Schreiber.

Schreiber added that he would seek a parliamentary investigation into the public works department’s maintenance programmes while pushing his “cut cabinet perks bill” in the legislature.

Zikalala said he would table other measures to tackle corruption and other forms of wrongdoing in his department when he presents his spending plans for the financial year 2023/2034 in parliament on Tuesday.

In March, it emerged the department of public works spent R7m last year installing generators at ministerial homes to cushion politicians from load-shedding – while most ordinary citizens remained in darkness.
